Students will encounter another dynamic, interdisciplinary field: Disability Studies. DS challenges medical approaches to disability, interrogating the social, cultural, and intellectual construction of disability and attending to the experiences of disabled people. Class time will be devoted to discussion and student-led presentations. We will ask: how can engagement with DS scholarship provide support for “real-world” interventions, particularly in the health care arena? With this question in mind, each student will pursue a substantial research project. Topics to be discussed include: social vs. medical models of disability; disability rights activism and health care access; eugenics, reproductive rights, and selective abortion; disability history and (de)institutionalization; embodiment and sexuality; technology and accessibility; identities and intersectionality; disability life narratives; and representations of disability in literature and the arts.
